

TECHNOCRACY IS THE ANSWER TO EVERY FUTURE PROBLEM

(Ankarta, Turkey) - Our own founder Alexander Ophis was featured recently in TIME magazine, where he spoke about the future merger of tech companies with government affairs.

“We are already seeing the blurring of lines between the influence of tech companies and governments. Whether we are talking about legislation or elections (and whether the media acknowledges it or not) countries, continents, and the globe itself are being swayed by innovation.” Ophis stated.

“In the years a decades to come, it is mankind’s invention that will determine his destiny. And the entity which is first to market with the biggest solutions to our problems will be the entity which holds sway over the populace. I can foresee a day when the world is united not under the banner of one president or government, but under the banner of one corporation. This corporation will be the one to offer peace, safety, and security. But most of all, this company will offer technological solutions to our most pressing day-to-day needs. It is not unforeseeable this may include crisis intervention on a mass scale.”

Ophis explained that he envisions OMNI playing a central role in world affairs in the near future:

“OMNI, which is in many senses is an invisible force which exerts influence beyond the scope of the public eye, continues to expand its influence. We work very closely with many of the most significant power bases in the world, at this very moment. The WHO, WEF, EU, NATO, and Black Rock are but a few of the groups with which we are working closely. We look forward to growing our influence base greatly in the years to come.”
